

UKSA Report 2019-08-22

The UK Shuffleboard Association continues to tick over nicely. The challenge for us is to find more players who will take their participation to a competitive level rather than the purely social.

There has been a noticeable growth in the sport in night-club style establishments mostly around London. It isn't for the purist but it continues to promote awareness of shuffleboard which has to be a good thing.

We took part in a very well staged European Championship in Germany in March where we were proud to see Trevor Seaman achieve a very creditable second place, the highest position by a Brit in any ISA event. We are pleased to bring a small squad to Vienna but have to admit that cost and our currently weak currency have led to much-reduced numbers. This should be reversed in the Netherlands in two years time. In the meantime we are looking into the possibility of staging another home-based friendly event for our European friends.
